B. 1930, Grindrod, British Columbia. D. 1996, New Westminster, British Columbia, Irish (English). Third generation immigrant. Attended public school until grade four. Received additional vocational training as a waitress.	The personal archive of Dr. Sara Diamond donated to the Crista Dahl Media Library and Archive in 2018.	Sara was the interviewer. To provide insight into the history of BC women's labour and trade unionism from the 19th century through the 1950s, Diamond was a labour organizer who undertook oral histories to supplement sparse archival records. Records later provided a resource for her undergraduate thesis. The oral histories provide research and content for articles, lectures, Capilano College Labour History course content, an unpublished manuscript and follow-up interviews with some of the women for Diamond's Women's Labour History Project video productions.	Sara Diamond	[New Westminster, Vancouver, Greenwood]	Waitress; Restaurant workers	Not Specified.	Repository statement: The original recordings were made on reel-to-reel audio tapes; for each interview, two additional copies were subsequently made on audiocassettes. Audio cassettes were digitized to create .wav preservation copies.	1/4" open reel audio generally produced higher quality sound than audio cassettes, and was still a portable and affordable format. Audio cassettes for access purposes are easier for a broad range of individuals to use. Technology existed for relatively efficient transcription from audio cassettes. Audio recordings in archives are often left undigitized and often without transcripts. .wav files provide the potential to revive forgotten histories, uplift Indigenous and marginalized voices, and support new research. Camera and photography were readily available for documentation of personal and professional events	Audio recording was the standard for recording oral history in the 1970s. Portable video was available to Diamond by 1979 but was a more expensive option, the gear was intrusive, artificial lighting was required, and few producers and institutions had access to playback equipment. As soon as audio cassette technology was available to her, Diamond switched from 1/4" open reel, as the media cost was lower and the gear less intrusive.	Captures the emotional tenor of the interviewee and interviewer. May capture sounds from the surrounding environment that can inform context. Audio cassette technology made interviews more comfortable.

Audio cassette	1/4" open reel audio generally produced higher quality sound than audio cassettes, and was still a portable and affordable format. Audio cassettes for access purposes are easier for a broad range of individuals to use. Technology existed for relatively efficient transcription from audio cassettes. Audio recordings in archives are often left undigitized and often without transcripts, so files provide the potential to revive forgotten histories, uplift Indigenous and marginalized voices, and support new research.	Audio recording was the standard for recording oral history in the 1970s. Portable video was available to Diamond by 1979 but was a more expensive option, the gear was intrusive, artificial lighting was required, and few producers and institutions had access to playback equipment. As soon as audio cassette technology was available to her, Diamond switched from 1/4" open reel, as the media cost was lower and the gear less intrusive. Audio cassettes for access purposes are easier for a broad range of individuals to use. Technology existed for relatively efficient transcription from audio cassettes. Audio recordings in archives are often left undigitized and often without transcripts. .wav files provide the potential to revive forgotten histories, uplift Indigenous and marginalized voices, and support new research.	Audio recording was the standard for recording oral history in the 1970s. Portable video was available to Diamond by 1979 but was a more expensive option, the gear was intrusive, artificial lighting was required, and few producers and institutions had access to playback equipment. As soon as audio cassette technology was available to her, Diamond switched from 1/4" open reel, as the media cost was lower and the gear less intrusive.
